MLLE. ZOE'S TIGRESS

By WILL W. WHALEN.

Mlle. Zoe had a new lover, but what of that? Mile. Zoe had a lover in ev ery town that the circus reached. Other men less susceptible than Ralph Patterson lost their hearts at sight of

Now the circus was at Montgomery, But Ralph Patterson, being no laggard in love, had followed Mile. Zoe there. He sat now in her dressing apart-

"You are young to talk that way," he argued.
"Yes, I am young." There was a touch of bitterness in her rich voice.

"But despite my years, a man had Belle, as me."

"You can leave the circus." 'I had intended to do so before I lion-tamer. I intend to go on the

"You must wait for your answer." She glanced at her watch and arose as a sign of dismissal. "I must perform.

"Is there in this world today a man whom I could love a man worthy of woman's love?"

Mile. Zoe moaned these words piteously into the ear of her pet tigress. Fierce Lady Belle qualled before the fierce fire in the eyes of her mis-

The circus had remained three days at Montgomery; now it was to leave. Ralph Patterson was again in Mile. Zoe's dressing apartment, pleading his love, and devouring her beauty with his liquid blue eyes.

"I must tell you a story, Ralph," she said. "Seven years ago, in a coal mine town, not far from here, there lived a little girl, pretty with a moonpeam prettiness. She trusted everyone, because she was good. She trusted one to her sorrow-a man. He wooed her with soft, innocent blue eyes, like yours; he kissed her with frank lips, like yours; he caressed her with strong hands, like yours. That man left the little girl to the mercies of the world, her name gone, her life blasted. The world pointed the finger of scorn at her and shut its doors in her face, while he 'held his head high and cared for no man, he.' By chance, the little girl got some education; it doesn't matter how; she became brilliant and was sought after even by the one who had spoiled her life. The moonbeam turned into a sunbeam." He attempted to rise, but a hand, as soft and white as a snowflake, touched his wrist, and kept him to his seat. "I was that little girl, Ralph Patterson; you were that man. Take education, bleached hair and seven maturing years from Mile Zoe, and you have little Emma Stone, whom ou made an outcast."

His face lost its look of innocence; guilt flushed it from brow to chin. "Your voice was as winning then as now. I should love you, were your past unknown to me. You love me at last, but I do not want such love s yours. There has been an invisible cord binding us together all these years. Even the wounded insect may lame by its sting the one who has hurt it. You took from me all that made life worth the living; and revenge is written on my heart with a pen of iron, with the point of a diamond."

She cast a slance upon him, like the glance of a lioness that sees her prey within reach. He kept his eyes to the ground. He heard a curtain pulled aside, and heard something spring near his feet. One lightning glance showed him an open cage, Mile. Zoe, whip in hand, and a sleek tigress erouching to spring. He was petrified in his chair. Then the beast's claws had rent his flesh. Mile. Zoe had looked forward to her revenge, but now it was turned to ashes on her lips. All the woman in her was aroused to action; the tenevely one at Briny Moore for $300." derness of long ago came to life in her bosom; her hardness melted. She saw that Lady Belle had inflicted as yet only scratches and a slight wound. She lashed the beast from Patterson's shoulders, screamed to him to fly. He staggered to the opening in the can-vas, and out into the air and sunlight, calling for help.

But Lady Belle had tasted blood; no fear could hold her in check now. Her fangs met in Mile. Zoe's slender throat, her sharp cruel claws rent the beautiful shoulders.

Mlle. Zoe's circus tour was ended. (Copyright, by Daily Story Pub. Co.)

Method in His Madness.

"Do you know that you paid that woman five cents to ride on this car?" asked the friendly man on the back platform, after a woman had been let off at the corner.

"How do you figure that?" asked the conductor.

"Why, she handed you a 50-cent piece, and you gave her three dimes and a quarter in change," returned the friendly man.

"Oh, is that the woman I gave the three dimes and a quarter to?" said the conductor, smiling. "Well, she'll have a hard time passing the quarter. That's the way I get rid of all my bad money. Just so long as you give them a nickel or ten cents too much, they'll never stop to see whether it's good or bad."—New York Evening Post.
